

Stage Two – Monument Bridge to Trinity Square

Takes approximately 25 minutes

From Victoria Square the light-controlled crossing will take you up to one of the entrances to Prince's Quay. You will see the railings of Prince's dock, which has a sign reading Monument Bridge.

Prince's Dock was the third of Hull's town docks, opening in 1829. It was originally called Junction Dock because it joined Queen's Dock (now Queen's Gardens) with Humber Dock (now the Marina).

You will see both in later stages. Standing on Monument Bridge you will notice that it is no longer a bridge and you can't see a monument!

When this was a thriving dock area, before 1930, this was the bridge which opened to allow the movement of ships between Prince's Dock and Queen's Dock. The bridge would be raised 3 or 4 times a day much to the frustration of pedestrians and motorists.

(There is a photograph of how this area used to look in the 'Now & Then' section on our website)

The monument still exists; it's the huge column and statue dedicated to William Wilberforce that can be seen at the far end of Queen's Gardens in front of Hull College. It was moved in 1934 as part of a traffic re-organisation. Look around the pavement near the grey Monument Buildings – there is a marker to show where it once stood.

Near here, have a look over the glass barriers round Beverley Gate. Looking down you will see the foundations of the medieval gatehouse into the town of Hull. This is where, on St Georges Day 1642, the Governor of Hull, Sir John Hotham, refused King Charles I access to the town and its extensive arsenal, the largest outside London.

Although most of the North of England was Royalist, during the English Civil War, in typical Hull style they sided with Cromwell and the Parliamentarians. This was one of the first acts of defiance that sparked the beginning of the English Civil War. (To find out how this challenge to the King's authority affected the outcome of the Civil War, and to Sir John Hotham personally, see Hull and the Civil War in the "Want to know More?" section on our website)

From here walk passed Beverley Gate to the junction of Princes Dock Street and Whitefriargate and turn right and walk down Prince's Dock Street. As you walk move to the wide paved area on your right and look for the metre wide row of red coloured bricks set in the pavement on the dock side of the road. They represent the outline of the Old Town Walls built in the 14th century. Over five million bricks were used in the construction of the wall, mostly made locally at the Hull or Beverley brick yards.

On the opposite side of the road there is a building with 2 cellars, each with a brick arch. This was Colonial Chambers, built in the early 19th century, and was possibly the first purpose built office block. It is now a coffee shop and restaurant. Next along is Roland House, built earlier in the 19th century as Ferres Almshouse before Prince's Dock was opened.

The next building dated 1842, was the entrance to Trinity House Academy, a Nautical College founded in 1787. The college moved to a new site in 2013. The archway is one of the entrances to Zebedee's Yard, named after the longest serving headmaster of the college. It is now the location of one of Hull's memorials to over 6,000 fishermen lost at sea. It is now the location of one of Hull's memorials to over 6,000 fishermen lost at sea

The opening of Princes Dock formally known as Junction Dock, in effect, made the centre of Hull an island which could only be accessed over one of four bridges. The dock was renamed following the visit of Prince Albert with Queen Victoria in 1854.

The town of Hull became a city in 1897 as part of Queen Victoria's Golden Jubilee celebrations.

Walk further down Prince's Dock Street, on the right until you reach the end of Posterngate. Here the red bricks outline the 'postern', a check point which allowed one person at a time in or out of the town when the main gates were closed. You may also see the outlines of some of the many interval towers marked along the line of the wall. To your left is a row of Georgian buildings, now mainly restaurants and coffee bars.

At the corner of Posterngate is a large former warehouse, which has been a popular night club since the 1970s.

Now please walk down Posterngate. Wheelchair users might find this a difficult street to negotiate due to the uneven cobblestones and narrow pavement. If you decide to avoid it, Whitefriargate at the first cross roads you come to turn right down Trinity House Lane. At the end of Trinity House Lane you will see the other the end of Posterngate where you rejoin the other route.

Look down on the right hand pavement of Posterngate. Can you find the shoal of herring moulded into the bricks? These are part of Hull's Fish Trail. Carry on walking, crossing over Dagger Lane and past The Mission. This was previously a Seamen's Mission built in 1866, and has been a pub/ restaurants since 1995. (See: Hull's Pubs in our 'Want to Know More?' section)

Opposite the Mission, the two buildings next to the exit of Zebedee's Yard (used as a car park) are the one time Mercantile Marine Offices, built in 1868 and extended in 1874. This is where, until the mid 1980's, ships' crews would be signed on and discharged.

The large white building next to the offices is Carmelite House. The name comes from the Carmelite Monastery that stood near here in the 14th century. The monks or friars wore white robes which gave the name Whitefriargate to the street which runs along here. The present building was completed in 1826 as an Almshouse for Trinity House.

(See: Hull's Monasteries and Monks in the 'Want to Know More?' section of our website)

Opposite Carmelite House is No 6 Posterngate, the previous Parochial Offices for the main two Churches in Hull, Holy Trinity and St Mary's. It was built in 1864 as you can see from the carvings on the frieze above the doors of the building.

Back across the street is the former Harry Lazarus Hotel, one of the licensed emigrant lodging houses for overnight accommodation for European transmigrates en route to Liverpool, and then on to America, in the mid 19th and early 20th centuries. They would disembark from the Riverside Quay (near Humber Dock) to the lodging houses, and would then be escorted to the emigrant waiting room at the end of a platform in Paragon Station to wait for trains over to Liverpool and Manchester. The migrants were kept apart from locals because it was feared they might be infected with cholera.

The migrant's waiting room, built in 1885, still exist – it is now the Tiger's Lair, the bar for Hull City supporters on match day.

As you emerge from Posterngate, you will have arrived in Trinity Square with the magnificent Hull Minster (formally Holy Trinity Church) in view.

You will hear about Hull Minster at the beginning of Stage 3 of our walk.

So for now please cross over the end of Trinity House Lane and stand in front of the Kingston Hotel pub, and turn around.

The impressive white building opposite is Trinity House. It gets its name from Holy Trinity Church and was originally set up to look after visiting seamen.

Trinity House has occupied this site since the 14th century. Look up (being careful of passing traffic and people) and see the magnificently ornate three bay pediment over the main entrance of the House. With its reclining figures, unicorn, lion, and shield, it's well worth a couple of minutes of your time.

Just a little bit of Trinity House history. It gets its name from Holy Trinity Church, now Hull Minster, and evolved from a religious guild founded in 1369. Its members were from various occupations and it was formed to provide candles and masses and to ensure good attendance at funerals. By the 1450s it had changed to a guild for shipmasters only. It was later awarded a Royal Charter by Henry VIII in 1541 as the Guild of the Holy Trinity so, in its words, "that they might regulate the pilotage of ships in the King's streams". These duties continued until the Pilotage Act in 1987.

If we look to the right of the Trinity house entrance and you will see a green plaque which bears the name Thomas Ferris, master mariner, warden of Hull Trinity House, Mayor and Sheriff. A significant benefactor to Hull Trinity House leaving his estate for the benefit of distress and needy seafarers'.

If you want to know more about the wonderful men and his fascinating history then go to 'Beggars Bridge a Hull Story of Adventure, Love and Romance' in the Want to Know More section of our website.

It's now possible to take a tour around this magnificent building, information is available at the Information Pod in the Hull Interchange or you can see the Hull Trinity House website for details.

Also around here there are 2 pubs of particular interest. The first, The Kingston, just behind you, is a typical Mid-Victorian pub with one room built around a central bar.

The other one, a bit further down Trinity House Lane on the right is the Bonny Boat. It is known to have traded as early as 1791 and again it has a single room with lots of fascinating objects which reflect Hull's nautical past. Both are worth a moment of your time.

Well, you are now at the end of stage 2 of our walk and I really do hope you've enjoyed it.

When you're ready to start Stage 3 of our walk return to Trinity Square, facing Hull Minster, and go to the Trinity Square to the Marina section.

End of Stage Two

Stage Three begins in Trinity Square
